

PRESS RELEASE

12 March 2015

63,000 health practitioners stand ready to help transform nation's health, says Professional Standards Authority

The UK now has a real opportunity to get more out of its health and care workforce, the Professional Standards Authority said today. Acknowledging widespread recognition that we need new ways to deliver integrated care fit for the 21st century and tackle national health problems, Harry Cayton, the Authority's Chief Executive, called for people in charge of health and care services to use a wider range of occupational groups.

Mr Cayton made the comments as the Authority published its first report on the Accredited Registers programme, the Government programme to promote safety and quality in a wide range of health and care services across the UK. The extra level of assurance the programme offers gives commissioners and employers the confidence they need to make wider use of a workforce focused on prevention and wellbeing.

Commenting, Chief Executive of the Professional Standards Authority, Harry Cayton said:

“We all know we need to deliver new, innovative ways to improve people's health. The NHS in Scotland is re-examining the way they deliver services and exploring new models of integrated care better-suited to today. That means looking beyond the traditional confines of our health and care system and the traditional health professions. The 63,000 practitioners on 17 Accredited Registers covering 25 occupations must be a part of that, offering different approaches to care which commissioners can choose with the confidence that they are competent and safe.

“Having confidence in Accredited Registers covering health sciences, talking therapies, physical therapies and a range of complementary therapies means that we no longer have to depend solely on doctors and nurses but can create broader multidisciplinary teams. We must invest in prevention and wellbeing to deliver healthcare for the 21st century, and that means taking a wider view of the health and care workforce.”

The report published today sets out how the programme gives service users, employers and commissioners the confidence they need to use a wider range of practitioners. The benefits of the programme include:

- all Registers which have been accredited to date have made improvements to their working practices to gain accreditation from the Authority, improving overall quality across the different sectors
- if a practitioner is removed from one Accredited Register they cannot join another, protecting patients and consumers from malpractice

- all Accredited Registers are required to carry out careful risk assessments to ensure they understand the risks their occupation may pose to the public and to ensure that they are managing those risks effectively.

Cabinet Secretary for Health, Wellbeing and Sport Shona Robison MSP said:

“I welcome the findings of the Professional Standards Authority’s report which demonstrate the detailed benefits of the Accredited Registers programme for service users and professionals alike.

“Having one, recognised accreditation programme has a number of benefits both for the practitioner, the patient and the employer in providing reassurance that professionals are subject to the appropriate scrutiny. It is an excellent example of Right-touch Regulation, which improves the quality and safety of care.

“As we move towards the integration of health and social care, these professions covered by the Accredited Registers programme will become ever more important in helping to support more people at home or in a homely setting.”

ENDS

For further information or comment please contact the Professional Standards Authority communications team: psa@luther.co.uk or tel 020 7618 9100.

To download the report in full click here.

Find out more about Accredited Registers here.